§ 18:23 Availability of compensatory and punitive damages and jury trials—Generally
IX. EMOTIONAL INJURY DAMAGES

§ 18:24 Introduction
§ 18:25 Emotional damages: Threshold issue whether evidence supports any award
§ 18:26 — The burden is on the plaintiff to prove an injury
§ 18:27 — — Tort law’s traditional recovery thresholds governing compensation for emotional injuries do not apply in civil rights cases, but the need for real evidence to support such damages awards is taken quite seriously by the courts
§ 18:28 — — Emotional injuries will not be presumed and must be shown by a substantial evidentiary presentation
§ 18:29 — — Since a significant emotional reaction to a severe injury or loss is normal, expert testimony is not required to support damages for emotional distress, but substantial awards are frequently supported by expert opinion evidence
§ 18:30 — — Lay damages testimony, while not required by law, is in practice advisable
§ 18:31 — — Evidence that an emotional injury has manifested itself physically is probably not required by law, but is desirable
§ 18:32 — — The fact and extent of emotional injury can be lawfully inferred in part from the circumstances under which it occurred
